THE SITUATION IN EUROPE.

M. THIERS, one of the best informed, as he is one of the most distinguished men of Europe, in his able, eloquent, and exhaustive analysis of the foreign policy of France, delivered in the Corps Legislatif, on the 14th inst., remarked that his memory failed to supply a parallel instance of the seriousness of the present aspect of affairs in Europe.

Every State in Europe, he says, is the smallest and the largest, - Belgium, Switzerland, Russia, France and Austria, - is raising gigantic armaments. Under the well-adjusted and carefully guarded balance of power, wisely arranged more than three hundred years ago, such widespread alarm and uneasy anticipations were impossible, and such enormous "peace establishments" unnecessary. The people might be restive, but the monarchs felt secure. There might be internal commotions and even revolutions, but there was little dread from an attack on the part of a foreign power.

Now all this is changed. M. Thiers says, and in Prussia we must look to the cause of it. But Prussia would not have been emboldened to enter into a war against Austria, had she not been sure of the aid of Italy. Italy could not have entered into such an alliance without the consent of France; indeed, but for France there would have been no Italy (in its present political meaning). Napoleon, therefore, in M. Thiers' opinion, is personally responsible for all the wars of Continental Europe during the past ten years, for the great increase of public indebtedness, for the immense armies now every where levying, and the universal dread, panic among all, prevailing all over Europe, of great and wide-spread war impending.

The box of Pandora was opened, according to M. Thiers, when the Emperor committed the fatal blunder of recognizing a public policy on the basis of "nationalities," when he declared that the treaties of 1815 were no longer to be respected. The balance of power was a skillfully constructed machine, which had kept the economy of Europe in a peaceful position, until the Emperor, in an evil hour, threw away the balance, and substituted with unparalleled rashness, not satisfied to be well-entrenched alone, abolished the system that had hitherto worked so excellently, and launched out on the untried and stormy sea of "nationalities" and the "agglomeration of States." We cannot call that a system which, from its very nature, is ever shifting and unstable.

M. Thiers, for three hours, in complete physical exhaustion compelled him to stop, proceeded to unfold the foreign policy of the Emperor's Government, severely underrating upon it at every step. He recommended an alliance with England, now, he said, much more needed than thirty years ago, when the two governments made war upon Russia. Austria, also, in his opinion, could be gained to such an alliance, and all the smaller States would then come in of their own accord. After giving his views in detail on all the points, he concluded in the following peroration:

If an individual alone, without a party, without a name, without a following, could, by the instruments of power, adopt a far more judicious policy, than that which has been adopted by the Emperor, and could, by his influence, induce the Emperor to adopt it, I should be glad to see him do so. I should be glad to see him do so. I should be glad to see him do so.

This last was a Parthian shaft, and went home. M. de Bismarck, the Minister, and eloquent spokesman of the Government in the Chamber, rose next day and defiantly took up the gauntlet, by his opening sentence: "Not a single blunder has been committed by the Emperor's Government." He then proceeded to show that France had not lost prestige by the war in Germany last summer; that France forced Prussia to halt, when her victorious legions were on the outskirts of Vienna; that the treaty of Nickelsburg was dictated by Napoleon; that the French influence in the East had been maintained; that the French Republic had been established; that the French Republic had been established.

Another cause of difficulty that arose, or more correctly, that was published on the heels of the last named, in a dispute about the future possession or occupation of the fortress of Luxembourg. The possession of this stronghold (now German) by Prussian troops, would prove a decided advantage to the French, and a perpetual eyer sore, as well as a thorn in the flesh to their eastern neighbor. The French insist that Prussia is desirous of bringing Holland into the North German Confederation, and that the French Republic has a right to demand that Prussia should not do so.
